The height of the strings over the fingerboard (sometimes called the ACTION), and the curvature of the bridge, are matters of personal preference. Experience will indicate if adjustments need to be made so that the instrument is comfortable to play. Any alterations and repairs which may be necessary are generally best carried-out by a violin repairer, who will also be able to give advice on the condition, age and value of instruments.

As for strings, a certain amount of trial-and-error may be necessary in selecting those, which best suit the instrument and player. Traditional musicians have a preference for steel strings, for which adjusters (also called fine tuners) are necessary in order to tune accurately. These are attached to the tailpiece.

In some ways, the bow can be thought of as being the 'other half' of the fiddle. It greatly affects tone quality, and is of course the means by which the music is made. The choice of bow is a personal matter. Some prefer a heavy bow, while others favour a light one. There is no doubt that a good bow, well balanced and easy to play with, improves the music significantly.
